Stories from the field

Building bridges: mediation and conflict resolution through specialized volunteers

- ▶ Juana, a 50-year-old judicial facilitator from Chalatenango, dreams of a peaceful and happy community.

"Often people argue over small things that can be solved. We help them reach agreements and solutions," she explained with a sense of determination in her voice.

She works as a volunteer judicial facilitator and helps people in her community resolve conflicts that vary in size and complexity.

When the conflict can't be fixed by a facilitator, it's referred to a court. The volunteer judicial facilitator programme, an initiative implemented by the Supreme Court of Justice and supported by UNHCR, gathers 600 community volunteers around El Salvador, like Juana. Through this programme they strengthen their capacities on legal issues, conflict resolution and how to provide close support to people.

"In my community, I have seen people who have had to flee the country due to gang violence, to protect their lives", she explains emotionally.

Juana accompanied them, asserting their rights and referring them to different institutions. She knows first-hand the pain of forced displacement, as her own son had to leave five years ago and sought asylum in other country.

By offering capacity-building to this network of volunteers, UNHCR aims to raise awareness about internally displaced people's rights, and the available services.

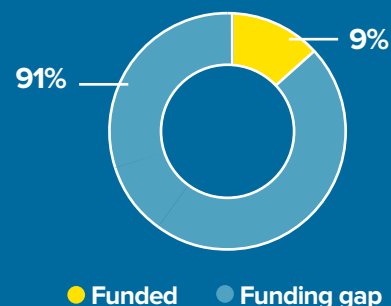

"I believe in building bridges, not walls," says Juana. "We need to work together to create a better world for ourselves and our children." As a judicial facilitator, she is bringing people together to find common ground and solutions.

The best way to support UNHCR's appeal is through unearmarked contributions. Such flexible funding at global level is key in allowing a timely response to the evolving needs wherever required.
