Guinea - Mali - Algeria - Morocco - Spain (54%)

Mali - Algeria - Morocco - Spain (41%)

Morocco - Spain (100%)

Syria - Algeria - Morocco - Spain (18%)

Abuse on the route

3 in 5 respondents reported experiencing some form of abuse on the route

48% of people that travelled through Morocco reported experiencing abuse in the country (especially in the areas close to Ceuta and Melilla) including physical violence and being forcibly moved by authorities to areas in southern Morocco

40% cases of reported abuse involved physical abuse

3% reported sexual abuse or exploitation on the route (10% of female respondents)

Police or security forces were identified as perpetrators in 53% of abuse cases

People who were minors when they left their country were more vulnerable to abuse on the route.

INTRODUCTION

In 2017, 28,300 refugees and migrants arrived to Spain by the Western Mediterranean route.¹ 78 per cent arrived by sea, and 22 per cent crossed by land routes to the Spanish North African enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla.² Government figures for 2017 indicated that 87 per cent of these arrivals came from eight countries: Morocco (19 per cent), Algeria (18 per cent), Guinea (14 per cent), Côte d'Ivoire (13 per cent), Gambia (10 per cent), Syria (8 per cent), Cameroon (3 per cent), and Mali (2 per cent). Based on Government data, 86 per cent of arrivals to Spain through the Western Mediterranean route were adults (8 per cent female; 92 per cent male) and 14 per cent were children.³ At least two-thirds of the children who arrived in 2017 were unaccompanied or separated (just over 2,400).⁴

While more than half of the arrivals from Sub-Saharan African countries arrived by sea to the Spanish mainland, Syrians arrived almost exclusively by land to Melilla (97 per cent), during the period covered by the profiling exercise. In addition, roughly half of Moroccans and Algerians arrived by sea to the Spanish mainland, with the remaining arrivals roughly divided between Ceuta and Melilla.

6 REFUGEES AND MIGRANTS ARRIVING IN SPAIN

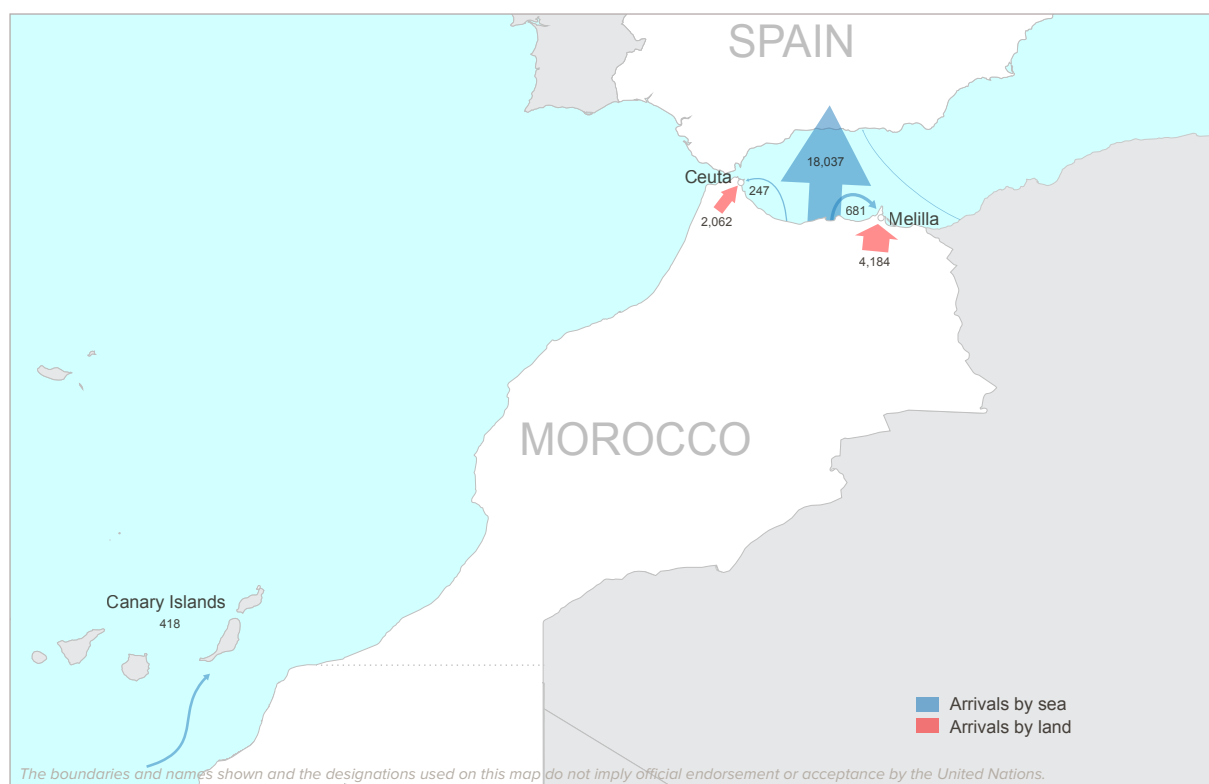

By the end of 2017, 30,445 people had applied for asylum in Spain; 36 per cent were from Africa or the Middle East,⁷ largely arriving through the Western Mediterranean route. The rest were mainly from Central or Latin America (51 per cent), or Eastern Europe (9 per cent), mostly arriving by air and land.⁵

* This includes 19% or 5,715 first-time asylum applications from the Middle East (particularly Syrians and Palestinians), 9% or 2,600 applications by West Africans (particularly Guineans and Ivorians) and 6% or 1,965 first-time asylum applications by North Africans (particularly Algerians and Moroccans). Decisions on first time applications were overwhelmingly positive for applicants from the Middle East and East Africa (92% of 3,615 and 100% of 90 decisions respectively were positive), but most commonly were rejections for North and West Africans (just 6% of 1,405 and 4% of 810 decisions respectively were positive). PROFILING OBJECTIVES

While a significant number of analyses and data collection activities have been conducted on sea arrivals through the Eastern and Central Mediterranean routes (from Turkey to Greece; and North Africa to Italy), information on arrivals via the Western Mediterranean route to Spain is more limited. This includes the Spanish coasts, as well as the Canary Islands, and the land and sea crossings into the Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla. Given the increased numbers arriving in Spain in 2017, this profiling exercise was conducted to address a need for up-to-date information on the profile of persons arriving to Spain through this route,^{*} including information on the demographic characteristics, socio-economic background, motivations for departure, routes taken, and exposure to protection risks along the journey.

It is important to note that the profiling exercise does not constitute an assessment of international protection needs of the respondents or arrivals in general.

The names attributed to photos included in the report have been changed.

^{*} The profiling addresses only arrivals to Spanish coasts and the Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla, and does not include arrivals of refugees and migrants by air and other land routes.

METHODOLOGY AND LIMITATIONS

The profiling exercise was conducted in partnership by UNHCR and Agencia Estatal Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas (CSIC).^{*} The Government of Spain facilitated access to reception centres run by the Government and non-Government organisations and to detention centres in the mainland. Reception centre staff and the National Police were instrumental in facilitating access to refugees and migrants for the interviews. The initial findings were reviewed through a collaborative analysis workshop involving UNHCR and CSIC staff conducted on 20 December 2017.

The profiling exercise represents one of the largest data collection exercises conducted by a humanitarian organisation in Spain. The information gathered will be useful in informing appropriate responses in countries of origin, transit, and destination.

The study employed structured individual interviews covering a range of protection related issues. The population interviewed consisted of adult refugees and migrants who arrived by sea to the Spanish mainland and islands between 1 September 2017 and 31 December 2017, and to Melilla and Ceuta by land and sea between 1 August 2017 and 30 November 2017. The profiling was only designed for and conducted with adults.

Between October and December 2017 a total of 1,002 interviews were carried out: 498 interviews in 24 humanitarian reception facilities across 13 mainland provinces; 102 interviews in five Foreigner Detention Centres (CIEs);^{} and 402 interviews in the Temporary Reception Centres (CETIs) in Ceuta (165 interviews) and Melilla (237 interviews). Sometimes individuals who had entered Spain through Ceuta or Melilla were interviewed in CIEs or Humanitarian Reception Centers on the mainland, where they had been transferred. These interviews were counted as belonging to the Ceuta and Melilla sub-samples respectively, since the sampling design is based on place of arrival.

Participants in Ceuta and Melilla were selected through quota sampling^{} to ensure adequate national ^{*} CSIC (Spanish National Research Council) is Spain's largest public research institute and plays a key role in developing scientific and technological policy in Spain and worldwide. CSIC has worked extensively on international migration and refugee issues.

^{} Interviews were conducted in these detention centres in order to ensure that the sample of interviews was sufficiently diversified. Most Algerians and Moroccans are taken to these detention centres, two of the largest groups of origin in arrivals during the fieldwork. In these centres, while interviewees were alone with the interviewers, the conditions varied substantially from centre to centre.

^{} Directors from CETIs provided aggregated statistics on the gender and nationality of the migrants and refugees residing at the time in the two CETIs. From these, the corresponding quotas of numbers of interviews to be realized were calculated.

and gender representation. Participants in the Humanitarian Reception Centres on the Spanish mainland were selected through a multi-stage cluster sampling approach* to ensure the inclusion of centres run by a variety of organisations from regions across the country. Given that refugees and migrants are randomly assigned to centres across the mainland, selection of the sample was done by identifying specific centres and then inviting all people meeting the criteria to participate (with very high rates of participation). Participants in the detention centres were invited to participate following an information session, with varying rates of participation by centre and nationality. The research team worked to ensure adequate coverage of nationalities and both genders in the sample selection.

One of the main challenges faced was the lack of comprehensive information on arrivals disaggregated by place and date of arrival, type of reception facility, nationality, age, and gender. Additional challenges included the high rate of people leaving Humanitarian Reception facilities within a few days or weeks of arrival and a lack of clarity about when people in Temporary Reception Centres in Ceuta and Melilla would be transferred to the mainland (with the period spent in the enclaves varying by site and nationality). Due to these challenges and the diversity of the population, weightings were not applied to the samples.

It should be noted that as a result of the limited information for a proper sampling design and limited access to detention centres, arrivals to Ceuta and Melilla, people coming from Guinea, and female arrivals tend to be over-represented in the overall sample, while Algerians, Moroccans and people in mainland detention facilities tend to be under-represented.

The interviews were conducted by a team of nine enumerators (three male; six female) in Arabic, Bambara, English, French, Mandingue, Sarakole, and Spanish. The questionnaire (see Annex B) was conducted using mobile data collection devices. The average duration of the interviews was approximately 30 minutes.

The sample size allows for the estimation of significant results at a 95 per cent confidence level with a five-point margin of error for the adult sea arrivals to the Spanish mainland. The confidence level for the adult land and sea arrivals to Ceuta and Melilla is less, allowing for an estimation of significant results at a 95 per cent confidence level with a seven-point margin of error. The sample size by nationality allows for the estimation of significant results at a 90 per cent confidence level with varying margins of error by the most common nationalities including Morocco (11 points), Algeria (8 points), Guinea (4 points), Côte d'Ivoire (7 points), Gambia (11 points), Syria (8 points), and Mali (4 points).

As with all self-reported information, there is the potential for bias in the answers provided due to imperfect or partial knowledge (e.g. the names of towns and cities along the route are based on those names respondents were aware of at the time and that they recalled during the interview). To mitigate this, all information collected was strictly anonymous, and respondents were informed that the answers they provided would have no impact on their asylum request or assistance received. Conducting the data collection through a partner organisation (CSIC) also provided greater neutrality and independence from UNHCR.

* The multi-stage cluster sampling approach involved the creation of different clusters of Humanitarian Centers, defined according to their geographical location across the country, the size of the centers and the gender of their residents (there were a few centers only for women). Then, one or more clusters were chosen at random and everyone within the chosen cluster was sampled.

 It should be noted that official statistics with the full breakdown of arrivals by nationality and site were not available for November and December. For the population in Ceuta and Melilla (the sample selection of which included only August to November), the population for November was estimated to be the average of the monthly arrivals from August to September.

 Females were 12 per cent of the sample compared with 8 per cent of all arrivals. This is largely due to the relatively low number of interviews conducted in detention centres (with predominantly male respondents).

BACKGROUND AND DEMOGRAPHIC PROFILE

In line with Government figures for 2017, which indicate that the majority of arrivals to Spain by the Western Mediterranean route came from eight countries,⁷ the nationalities of the sample of respondents of the profile exercise were broadly consistent with those arriving by this route in 2017. Eighty per cent of respondents came from those same eight countries: Guinea (25 per cent), Côte d'Ivoire (13 per cent), Algeria (10 per cent), Syria (10 per cent), Mali (9 per cent), Gambia (5 per cent), and Morocco (5 per cent), and Cameroon (3 per cent). In addition, there were 3 per cent each from Senegal, and Yemen. The remaining 11 per cent came from 26 countries including Guinea Bissau, Palestinian, Liberia, Sierra Leona, Burkina Faso, Eritrea, Ghana, Nigeria, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Tunisia, and Bangladesh.

The profiling exercise findings indicate that 85 per cent of adult arrivals were aged between 18 and 30 years, with 74 per cent of females and 86 per cent of males falling within this age range. Moreover, 12 per cent of all respondents were under 18 years old when they embarked on the journey. This rate was higher among Guineans (20 per cent) and Syrians (22 per cent). Furthermore, the proportion of females was higher among Syrian (43 per cent) and Ivorian (25 per cent) arrivals when compared to other nationalities.

Nearly half the respondents identified their ethnicity either as Arab (25 per cent)^{} or Fula/Pular (23 per cent).^{} Other commonly identified ethnicities were Soninke (8 per cent),^{*} Malinke (6 per cent),^{} Susu (3 per cent),^{} Doula (3 per cent) and Berber (2 per cent).^{} Two-thirds of respondents spoke French while 19 per cent spoke Arabic. Eleven per cent of respondents from Sub-Saharan Africa could only speak

* By nationality, the proportions of respondents in the survey is roughly equivalent to the proportion of each of these nationalities arriving in 2017, with slight underrepresentation of Moroccans and Algerians.

African languages. Further, respondents overwhelmingly identified as coming from the most common religion in their country of origin, with less than 10 per cent coming from minority religions.

The majority of Ivoirians and Gambians came from the largest city in their country of origin, most Algerians came from a variety of large urban centres in the north of the country, and Guineans came from a spread of regions across the country. By contrast, Syrians, Moroccans and Malians tended to come from several specific regions within the country: Syrians were more likely to come from Aleppo, Idlib and Hama,⁸ and

Moroccans from Tangier-Tetouan, while Malians predominantly come from Kayes region.

The majority of people profiled were single (70 per cent), while 28 per cent were married or had a long-term partner, and 3 per cent were separated or divorced. Women were nearly three times as likely to be married or have a long term partner (52 per cent) compared with men (19 per cent), and were also more likely to be travelling with their partner (28 percent, compared with 4 percent among men). Approximately 5 per cent of female respondents did not know whether their partner was still alive.* Only 4 per cent of all respondents had a partner already living in Europe. Two per cent of respondents, mostly from Morocco, identified as lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender or intersex (LGBTI).

Some 52 per cent of female and 22 per cent of male respondents stated that they have children. Of those, 67 per cent of women with children mentioned that their child was travelling with them, compared with only 14 per cent of men with children. Younger respondents were more likely to have travelled alone while nearly all respondents aged 60 years and above were travelling with family members. Almost 60 per cent of those who were under 18 years old when they started their journey were unaccompanied children. Syrians (78 per cent) and Malians (60 per cent) were more likely to be travelling with people they knew beforehand than the other nationalities (53 percent).

One in five female respondents was pregnant or lactating at the time of the interview, 11 per cent of respondents reported having a chronic medical condition, while an additional 7 per cent reported that they had developed an acute medical condition in the previous two weeks. For both there was no significant variation by gender.

* All male respondents asked the same question knew whether or not their partner was still alive

 Respondents were asked only whether their partner or children were already living in Europe. 27% of respondents reported having children, with just 2% reporting having children that were adults at the time of the interview. Respondents reported that no children were already living in Europe. Instead, most respondents' children were reported to have remained in respondents' country of origin (75%) or were with the respondent in Spain (25%)

The majority of respondents had completed at least primary school (86 per cent) before embarking on the journey to Spain. This included 65 per cent that had completed some form of post-primary education and

IDENTIFICATION DOCUMENTS

Upon departure from the country in which respondents had spent most of their lives, 81% of those interviewed reported having a passport or national identification card. When interviewed, just under half of the respondents had a national passport. However, this varied significantly by nationality from Syrians (97 per cent) and Moroccans (75 percent) to Ivoirians (39 per cent) and Guineans (21 per cent). Of those who had a passport, most (60 per cent) did not have their passport with them when interviewed.

8 per cent had completed tertiary education. The level of education was typically lower among Gambian, Ivorian and Malian respondents and higher among Algerian, Moroccan, Guinean and Syrian respondents.

One-third of respondents mentioned that they had never worked before leaving for Spain, which may be explained by the young age of many respondents at the time of departure (42 per cent were below 21 years old). The most frequently cited occupations for both men and women were small-scale trade, construction, agriculture/fishery, trade, crafts, and transportation.

MOTIVATIONS FOR DEPARTURE *

The reasons respondents gave for leaving their country of origin often involved multiple factors with very different and complex circumstances. While 39 per cent of respondents mentioned that their motivations were solely economic, the rest provided other, or additional, reasons for leaving. The most commonly cited non-economic reasons were war/conflict (18 per cent of respondents), family disputes (17 per cent) –which frequently overlapped with issues such as ethnic discrimination, forced marriage or domestic violence– and fear of harm for political reasons (8 per cent).*

Variations across the nationalities and profiles of respondents were noted in the reasons provided for leaving, for example women were more likely to provide reasons for leaving that were not solely economic (78 per cent versus 55 per cent for male respondents). All Syrians cited the conflict as one of the main reasons for departure; a reason also frequently cited by Yemenis. Syrian respondents mentioned a range of additional reasons as well, including military service evasion (12 per cent), fear of forced recruitment (9 per cent), fear of harm for political reasons (7 per cent), and sexual and gender-based violence (2 per cent).

Twenty-five per cent of Moroccan respondents, all male, stated that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender was one of their main reasons for leaving, and several of these respondents also stated family disputes and a fear of imprisonment. Other commonly cited reasons for leaving were family

* When asked about the reasons why they left the country of origin (“What were the reasons you left this country?”), respondents were not provided with a pre-defined list of answers. Instead, respondents answered in their own words and in an open manner, telling their stories, frequently with a high level of detail. Interviewers were trained to identify and check all the reasons mentioned against a list of possible categories.

 These also included limited access to basic goods (such as food, accommodation, hygiene) and services (such as schooling, healthcare or transportation); the search for educational and economic opportunities abroad.

 These included: conflict/war; discrimination/persecution (based on ethnicity; religion; sexual orientation/gender identity; other); fear of harm for political reasons; election violence; sexual/gender-based violence; military service evasion; fear of forced recruitment; fear of prosecution/imprisonment; fear of imprisonment for common crimes; fear of death penalty; victim of trafficking/fear of traffickers; female genital mutilation; domestic violence; fleeing forced marriage; forced work; ex-combatant; disputes within family; wish to reunify with family abroad; expelled by the authorities; lack of documentation; orphan; sent by family; generalized corruption; natural disasters/ climate change.

* The profiling exercise is not a refugee status determination process. The results should not be considered as indicative of whether or not an individual of any nationality would qualify for refugee status.

 With the exception of one Syrian who mentioned that he left Syria to study abroad but has been unable to return due to the subsequent outbreak of conflict.

*Respondents could provide more than one response

disputes (19 per cent), fear of prosecution or imprisonment (19 per cent) and a fear of harm for political reasons (15 per cent)—some of whom stated that they had been expelled by the authorities.

Among the 47 per cent of Algerians citing other reasons, the most common of these reasons was family disputes (21 per cent of all Algerian respondents), followed by fear of unfair prosecution or imprisonment (8 per cent) and individual persecution (7 per cent). However, a variety of other reasons were also cited, including ethnic-based discrimination or persecution (four per cent), religious-based discrimination or persecution (three per cent), domestic violence (three per cent), fear of forced recruitment (three per cent), or discrimination due to sexual orientation or gender identity (two per cent).

Both Ivoirians and Guineans, cited family disputes at relatively high rates as being among their reasons for leaving (27 per cent and 29 per cent respectively). 17 per cent of Ivorians (2% of male respondents; 60% of female respondents) mentioned escaping forced marriage, some of whom also referred to female genital mutilation (5 per cent of all or 20 per cent of female respondents) and domestic violence (5 per cent overall; 3 per cent of male and 10 per cent of female respondents) as factors in this. Meanwhile, 23 per cent of Ivoirians referred to fear of harm for political reasons, electoral violence, or conflict (and often a combination of these factors).

Among Guineans, 29 per cent stated that family disputes were one of the main reasons behind their decision to leave, often combined with other factors including loss of parents (10 per cent), domestic violence (5 per cent), escaping forced marriage (3 per cent) or female genital mutilation (1 per cent). Further, 16 per cent of Guineans mentioned that they left due to ethnic discrimination or persecution, a reason cited more often by respondents from the Nzerekore region, a region that has witnessed ethnic violence in the past.¹¹

SEEKING ASYLUM

When asked about their intention to apply for asylum, 23 per cent of respondents were already in the asylum procedure in Spain, 21 per cent were considering applying for asylum, 34 per cent had no plans to seek asylum in Spain or elsewhere, and 22 per cent did not know if they would. Of those who were considering applying, two-thirds were considering applying in Spain, with the remaining third intending to apply elsewhere in Europe. Moroccans and Algerians overwhelmingly reported that they were considering applying for asylum in Spain, while Guineans were the most likely to report they were considering applying elsewhere (48 per cent), mainly in France.

Among respondents who only reported economic reasons for leaving their countries of origin, nine per cent had applied for asylum while half declared they had no intention to seek asylum. Intention to seek asylum was cited more commonly among respondents who mentioned other reasons for leaving: one third of these respondents had already applied for asylum at the time of the interview; however, one quarter did not intend to apply for asylum.

For each nationality, there was little difference between the asylum-seeking intentions of males and females. Those with tertiary education were more likely to have applied for asylum compared with those with lower levels of education (55 per cent and 22 per cent respectively).

Syrians and Moroccans were the most likely to already have submitted an asylum application (at 88 and 63 percent respectively). The figure of Moroccan asylum-seekers is likely to be an over-estimation due to the under-sampling of detention centres, where numbers of Moroccan arrivals are higher, and their asylum applications tend to be typically lower. A high proportion of Malians (59 per cent) — many of whom reportedly left Mali solely for economic reasons — indicated that they did not intend to apply for asylum.

Among the respondents who stated that they did not know whether they would apply for asylum, some explained that they did not understand the concept of asylum; others felt that they needed more time to decide or that they needed more information about the process; and some — in Melilla and in detention centres — were uncertain whether they had already applied for asylum or not. Several of these respondents further explained that these situations were due to a lack of interpreters, poor understanding of the process and inaccurate information provided to them. Understanding of the asylum process does not differ significantly across different nationalities, language groups or by gender, although it does vary by type of facility where the interview was conducted (see below).

In Melilla, 60 per cent of those who participated in the exercise had already applied for asylum. Although a large number of Syrians were interviewed from this location, the asylum application rates among other nationalities in Melilla were also higher than average. In contrast, the asylum application rates in Ceuta (13 per cent) and Humanitarian Centres in mainland Spain (11 per cent) were significantly lower than in Melilla. Several respondents in Ceuta explained that they wanted to wait until they were transferred to the mainland before applying. A widespread belief is that applying in Ceuta and Melilla would result in delays in the transfer to the Spanish mainland. One 30-year-old respondent commented that he would not apply for asylum in Melilla because others who had applied stayed three months or more in the CETI, considerably longer than those that did not apply and when they were transferred to mainland Spain, they were not provided with any support.

THE ROUTE

“We tried to go from Libya to Europe but the militias took our money and brought us back to Libya. After that experience, my husband and I decided to come to Europe through Spain instead.”

23-year-old Syrian woman

Ninety-two per cent of those interviewed reached Spain through Morocco, while 7 per cent came directly from Algeria (mainly Algerians) and 1 per cent travelled directly from Senegal to the Canary Islands.

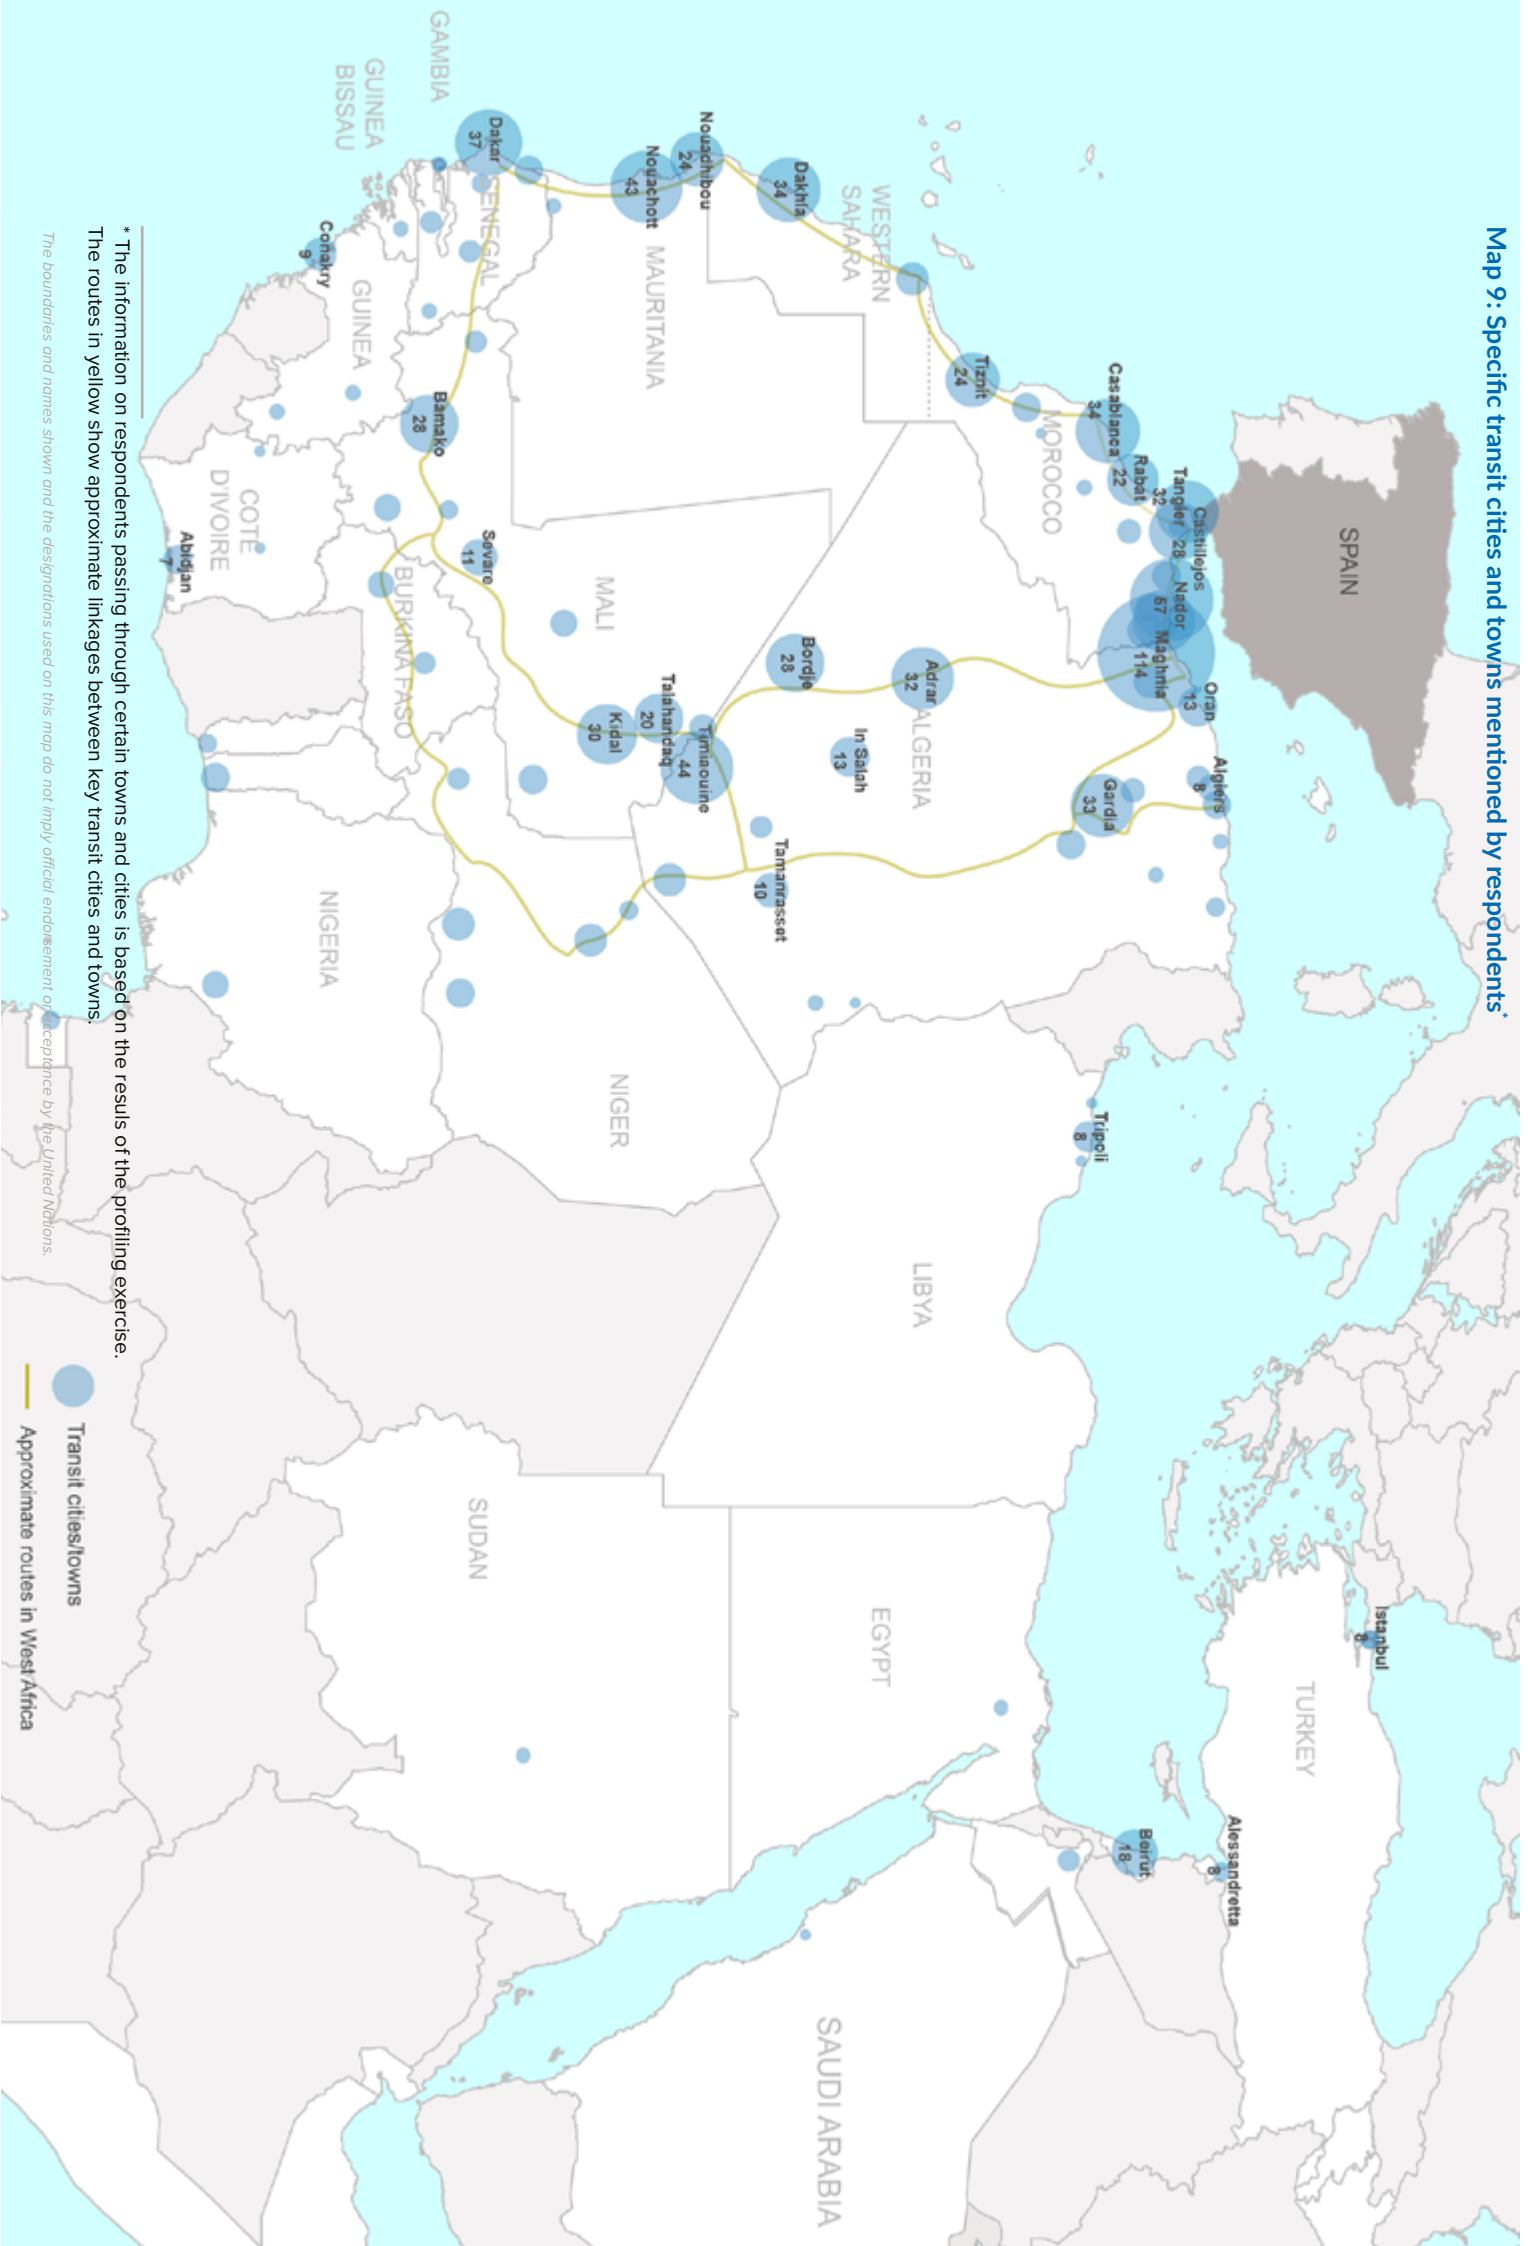

Other countries that respondents commonly transited through included Mali (37 per cent), Niger (13 per cent), and Mauritania (12 per cent). A significant proportion flew directly to Morocco from their country of origin, including 40 per cent of Malians and 25 per cent of Ivoirians. On average, Malians that flew to Morocco took five months to travel to Spain compared with 18 months for those who travelled overland. Syrians had the most diverse routes, roughly split in four categories: 27 per cent travelled directly from Syria to Algeria or Morocco; 33 per cent had first gone to Lebanon, 23 per cent went first to Turkey; and the remaining 17 per cent started their journeys in different Middle Eastern countries. Most Syrians had commenced their journeys several years ago, departing from Syria most commonly between 2012 and 2014. Only one respondent had left Syria during 2017. Of the Syrians for whom Turkey was their first country of transit after Syria, 61 per cent stayed for less than 3 months. By contrast, Syrians first arriving in Lebanon comprised two groups, with 47 per cent reporting having spent less than 3 months there, while 44% had spent at least one year there.

Only five per cent of respondents reported having been in Libya on the route, most of whom were Syrian. Most (54 per cent) had spent less than 3 months in Libya, while 25 per cent reporting having spent at least one year there. Some respondents added that they had considered going to Italy through Libya, but decided instead to travel to Spain. The main reasons given for changing their route was their understanding that the Libya route was closed. Three people had previously embarked on sea voyages to Italy from Libya but were intercepted or rescued by the Libyan Coast Guard and returned to Libya. Several Syrians and Yemenis emphasised that Europe was the only option left for them due to border closures, limiting their access to other countries in the Middle East.

Duration

About half of the people interviewed took less than a year between leaving their country of origin and arriving in Spain (52 per cent), while 48 per cent took more than a year, including 20 per cent that took more than three years. Factors that influenced the duration of the journey included long-term stays for various reasons such as studies, work, attempts to settle in other African or Middle Eastern countries, the availability and cost of transport, the need to work to finance onward movement, involuntary detention, and forced movement. While on the route, 28 per cent of respondents stayed in at least one country for more than a year, most commonly in Morocco and Algeria. Most were from Guinea, Côte d'Ivoire, Syria and Mali.

Organisation of journey

Of the 323 respondents that volunteered additional information about how they organised their journey, 20 per cent purchased a “full package” trip to Spain. This involved paying someone to organise all aspects of the trip to Spain, including accommodation, travel, and other facilitation. This was common among Algerians (21 per cent), Moroccans (17 per cent) and Senegalese (17 per cent). Journeys organised as a full package were typically more than twice as fast as other journeys (12 months versus 28 months), and also cheaper (€1,800 on average versus €3,900 for trips organized leg-by-leg). Some respondents mentioned that the cost of the journey varied based on the profile of the person and the resources they were assumed to have at their disposal.

By contrast, the main reasons people organised their journey on a “step-by-step” basis included a lack of awareness of other options, insufficient funds up-front, the need to improvise after fleeing due to insecurity, and a lack of trust of smugglers, or a lack of contacts with smugglers. The crossing between Morocco and Spain was the section where people most heavily relied on smugglers.*

* It should be noted that travel to Morocco from several North and West African countries is relatively easy as they benefit from visa free travel to Morocco. This includes Algeria, Tunisia, Guinea, Côte d'Ivoire, Mali, Niger, Senegal and Ghana.

REPORTS OF ABUSE ON THE ROUTE *

Fifty-eight per cent of respondents reported that they had experienced abuse on the route. This rate was similar for both male and female respondents. Younger respondents, especially between 18 and 20 years old were more likely to have experienced abuse on the route. Those who were children when they left were also more likely to experience abuse on the route (73 per cent versus 55 percent for those who were adults at the time of departure). People from Cameroon, Guinea-Bissau, and Guinea were more likely to report abuse while Algerians, Moroccans, Gambians and Malians were the least likely to do so. The prevalence of reports of abuse was higher among persons who left their countries for reasons that were not solely economic (64 per cent versus 45 per cent among persons leaving solely for economic reasons).

* Respondents described their experiences (for up to three episodes) in their own words, and interviewers registered all applicable categories from the list provided. The question was: “Having in mind all these places where you have been and that you consider part of the journey that brought you to Spain... did you experience any violence, mistreatment, or other forms of abuse in any of these countries?” The categories include: physical abuse/violence; shooting/threat of shooting; labour exploitation; kept at a certain location against your will; forced to give blood or organs against your will; sexual abuse and exploitation (such as sexual favours in return for help/assistance); sold into slavery; forced separation from family; forced movement to another location; discrimination; extortion/corruption; psychosocial abuse (threat of physical assault, humiliation, intimidation; insults); deprived of water; deprived of food

 For Moroccans and Algerians this is likely due to respondents being legally entitled to be present in their countries and having travelled less far, they have been exposed to fewer risks compared to e.g. some West African countries. Nevertheless, more than one-third of Algerians still reported one or more incidents of abuse.

Nearly all of those who experienced abuse provided detail on their experience (97 per cent). In total, 563 respondents recounted 941 incidents of abuse.^{*} A quarter of the cases of abuse occurred at border crossings (25 per cent) while one per cent occurred during sea crossings. In addition, 48 per cent of cases occurred in a specific town or settlement, 19 per cent occurred while travelling between settlements and 6 per cent occurred in an unspecified place. Between one half and one third of those who transited through Morocco, Algeria and Libya experienced abuse while they were in the country (52 per cent, 41 per cent and 38 per cent respectively). All nationality groups reported experiencing abuse in both countries, with similar prevalence to that noted above. This was lower in Mali (27 per cent).

In Morocco, the highest rates of reported abuse took place in the regions surrounding Melilla (42 per cent of cases), and Ceuta (5 per cent of cases) including the border crossings and Tangier (10 per cent of cases). These allegations often referred to police harassment and forced relocation to other places in Morocco, typically by national authorities arresting people close to Melilla and Ceuta, and moving them by bus to areas close to the Mauritanian or Algerian borders. Abuse at the border fences was reported to often involve violence and shooting. High rates of abuse in Tamanrasset, Algeria were reported, typically involving some combination of kidnapping, extortion, forced labour, physical violence and shooting.^{} The

* These numbers are an underestimation given the respondents who refused to answer further questions about mistreatment; 40 respondents who answered that they did not suffer mistreatment provided indications throughout the interview to the contrary; and the fact that incidents reported frequently formed a complex succession of abusive experiences

 14% of all respondents that reported abuse in Algeria (33 of 241 respondents) mentioned Tamanrasset. 25 respondents stated that smugglers, security forces or others had physically abused or threatened to shoot them (12, 5 and 8 respondents respectively). The remainder (8 respondents) highlighted labour exploitation, extortion and psychosocial abuse by persons unknown to them.

border between Morocco and Algeria close to Maghnia was described as being particularly dangerous with many respondents experiencing violence by security forces and being abandoned by smugglers.⁷ In Mali, the western transit hubs of Gao, Kidal and areas close to the border with Algeria were frequently cited in reports of abuse, particularly physical violence, kidnapping, psychosocial abuse and deprivation of food and water due to the desert conditions. Many reported being assaulted and/or kidnapped to extort money, and when they could not pay they were forced to work.

Most of the reported cases involved more than one type of abuse. Of all the respondents interviewed, 39 per cent mentioned that they had experienced physical abuse or violence on the route. Other frequently cited types of abuse included psychosocial abuse (33 per cent of all respondents), discrimination (20 per cent), shooting or threat of shooting (19 per cent), kidnapping (16 per cent), and forced movement (17 per cent) which regularly involved being left in the desert and in other potentially life-threatening situations (17 per cent). Reports of kidnapping were often combined with extortion or being held for ransom, sexual abuse, or labour exploitation. Two per cent of respondents saw a family member or friend die on the route, in most cases as a direct result of violence by smugglers, security forces, and/or kidnappers.

Three per cent of respondents reported that they were sexually abused (33 respondents^{}) on the route, 1 per cent were sold into slavery (14 respondents^{}) and 11 per cent experienced labour exploitation (108 respondents^{}).

* 6% of all respondents that reported abuse in Algeria (15 of 241 respondents) highlighted Maghnia. 10 respondents stated that smugglers or security forces had physically abused or threatened to shoot them (6 and 4 respondents respectively). The remainder (5 respondents) highlighted extortion and psychosocial abuse by smugglers.

 The reported incidents of sexual abuse were most commonly perpetrated by smugglers, security forces and persons unknown (12, 10 and 13 respondents respectively). 18 incidents occurred in Morocco, most commonly in or near Nador (7 incidents in total).

 The reported incidents of being sold into slavery were most commonly perpetrated by smugglers or persons unknown to the respondents (8 and 6 respondents respectively). 5 incidents occurred at the Mali-Algerian border near Talahandaq, which was the most commonly reported location.

* Incidents of labour exploitation were most commonly reported to be perpetrated by smuggler, security forces and persons unknown (33, 24 and 51 respondents respectively). Incidents were most commonly reported (25 in total) to occur in the border region between Mali and Algeria and Tamanrasset in Algeria.

The proportion of females that suffered sexual abuse was higher than among males (10 per cent vs. 2 per cent). It is notable that 20 male respondents reported experiencing sexual abuse including four who identified themselves as homosexual or transgender. Two of the women that suffered sexual abuse on the route were pregnant or lactating at the time of the interview.

The most frequently cited perpetrators of abuse were identified as being police or security forces (52 per cent of reported abuse cases), followed by unknown individuals or common criminals (23 per cent), and smugglers (21 per cent). Respondents frequently mentioned that more than one type of perpetrator was involved in a particular incident of abuse, such as smugglers working together with police at border crossings.

In Spain, 23 respondents (2 per cent) reported one or more incidents of abuse; most commonly psychological (10 incidents) or physical abuse (8 incidents) and were reported to have been perpetrated most commonly by security forces (5 incidents).

CONCLUSION

The vast majority of people arriving to Spain by the Western Mediterranean route originate from a small number of countries: Morocco, Algeria, Guinea, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Syria, Cameroon and Mali. The profile of these nationalities varied significantly in terms of demographics, reasons for leaving and intentions relating to seeking asylum once arriving in Spain. Arrivals were typically young men, with the exception of Syrians where 15 per cent were women, often travelling with other family members. That 11 per cent of respondents from Sub-Saharan Africa only speak African languages has implications for how information is communicated after they arrive in Spain, which is supported by respondent reports that adequate translation and interpretation was not always available (including in French).

The reasons given for leaving their country of origin suggest that people across different nationalities arriving via the Western Mediterranean route include profiles with international protection needs. Respondents that referred only to economic reasons for leaving their country of origin were also significantly less likely to apply for asylum compared with those who mentioned reasons that were not solely economic. At the time of the interviews, approximately one quarter of the respondents had already applied for asylum in Spain, especially Syrians based in Melilla. However, the findings also indicate that not all respondents had a strong understanding of the meaning of asylum and asylum procedures.

Most respondents reached Spanish territory from Morocco (92 per cent) with many transiting through Algeria and Mali beforehand. The journey to Spain was typically dangerous with nearly two-thirds reporting that they experienced abuse on the route (58 per cent). The highest proportions of abuse were reported to have occurred in Morocco and Algeria followed by Mali. The perpetrators were reportedly most commonly police or security forces, unknown individuals or common criminals and smugglers. This abuse often took the form of physical violence, psychosocial abuse, and kidnapping. In addition, 4 per cent of respondents reported sexual abuse on the route (especially among females). Of note, was the finding that 12 per cent of all respondents were under 18 when they left their country of origin; further, this group was also more likely to experience abuse on the route. Prevalence of reporting on abuse by individuals claiming to leave their country of origin for reasons that were not solely economic may indicate heightened levels of vulnerability to abuse and exploitation by those potentially in need of international protection along the route.

The findings of this exercise underscore the need for research that focuses on specific nationalities, types of facilities and locations of arrival to Spain. This report and the underlying dataset contribute to a stronger evidence base that can guide the programmes and policies of Governments, UNHCR, and other humanitarian organisations.

PRESENTATION

Read/explain respondent before each interview

Hi, how are you? Let me introduce myself: I am _____ and I am working for a Spanish research institute (CSIC / Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, or in English, the Spanish National Research Council). We are working to collect information to help UNHCR (UN High Commissioner for Refugees) better understand the situation of persons leaving their countries and arriving to the Spanish coasts/Ceuta and Melilla. For that, we would like to talk with persons who have arrived to Spanish coasts/Ceuta and Melilla since August (and up until the end of November) and we would like to invite you to participate in the study. It's important that you know that you do not have any duty to accept: you can decide now whether you want to participate or not. We understand your situation is probably not easy, so we want to hear about it, but we respect the wish not to do so. Before making a decision, please let me explain a bit more exactly what we are doing:

- ✓ The interview takes 15-20 minutes. We ask about yourself and your trip (e.g. where are you from, what is your occupation, why and how you have come to Spain and what problems you have faced on the way), but you can always skip any question you don't want to answer
- ✓ We will not ask nor register your name or any personal data that might identify you, so your answers will be anonymous. Your answers and anything that we discuss is strictly confidential. I will never share anything of our conversation with the authorities, the personnel of this centre, other persons you may be travelling with or anyone else – other than the coordinators of the study, who do not know who you are.
- ✓ The information provided goes directly to a database, which the coordinators of the study will use to produce statistics to describe the overall situation of persons arriving to Spanish coasts/Ceuta and Melilla. This information should help UNHCR to better understand how to assist persons, not only as they arrive in Spain, but also in the other countries where you have been before.
- ✓ This is not a registration nor an application for asylum. We have no relationship with any local or international authorities, nor the direction and personnel of this centre, or any organization providing assistance. So your participation will not affect your administrative situation or the assistance or treatment received.
- ✓ You can decline to participate and that is absolutely fine.

(P1) Are you willing to respond to some questions?

a. Yes b. No

If NO:

"Thank you anyway for having talked to me, we very much respect your wish not to discuss further. We assure you this will also remain confidential and it will not impact you in any manner. Thank you very much, and I wish you all the best"

(P2) Which languages do you speak in which you feel comfortable speaking? (Prompt EN, FR, AR)

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

01. How old are you? [If only date of birth, please calculate]

- Age: ____ [<18 → not eligible]

02. When did you arrive to Spanish territory? (If has been in Spanish territory several times, refer to the last one)

- Year: ____ Month: ____

02.1. (DO NOT READ) Did this person arrive on Spanish territory between 1 AUG and 30 NOV 2017?

(Enumerator to fill)

- a) Yes
- b) No [→ not eligible]
- c) Doesn't know [→ not eligible]
- d) Prefers not to say [→ not eligible]

03. Where did you arrive exactly?

- a) Spanish mainland or islands →
 - 03.1 Province _____
 - 03.2 Municipality _____
- b) Ceuta
- c) Melilla
- d) Doesn't know → Details provided: _____
- e) Prefers not to say

04. How did you arrive on Spanish territory?

- SEA: Wooden boat → 04.1
- SEA: Inflatable boat with engine → 04.1
- SEA: Inflatable boat without engine → 04.1

→ 04.1 Approximately, how many people departed on this boat? ____

- SEA: Jet ski
- SEA: Windsurf board
- SEA: Swimming

- LAND: On foot, through the fence
- LAND: On foot, through border crossing point
- LAND: Vehicle (truck, car...)
