Arrivals and Departures

Greek coast guards rescued 120 refugees and migrants in three separate incidents off the islands of Lesbos and Samos, authorities said on Wednesday morning.

The Greek press reports that Turkish observers who have arrived to oversee the implementation of the EU agreement between Turkey and Greece request Greek authorities to share with them a list of persons who are to be returned to Turkey one week prior to the readmission procedure. This is to allow adequate time for necessary checks.

Condition of People

On Wednesday, an increased presence of military forces and Special Police Forces of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia was noticed at the border crossing with Greece. A group of around 100 to 200 people attempted to remove the border fence on the Greek side of the border using blankets. Tear gas was fired by former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonian police with the aim of dispersing the crowd. This led also to increased presence of Greek Special Forces. No injuries were reported in the clashes.

Critical Developments

In Germany, the coalition government set out details for an envisaged integration law; leaders of the Social Democrats (SPD), Christian Democrats (CDU), and their Bavarian party, CSU, agreed on key issues to be included in a draft which will be decided upon during a government retreat on 24 May. The draft law sets out that asylum seekers' refusal of integration measures would lead to reduced social benefits. Consequences would also occur if people violate obligations regarding their residency. Moreover, 100,000 so-called 1-Euro jobs for asylum seekers shall facilitate access to the labour market and a "priority review" regulation that prioritized German nationals and nationals of other EU countries over asylum seekers in job applications shall be omitted.

Austrian Minister of Interior, Johanna Mikl-Leitner, announced that by the end of 2019, 50,000 asylum-seekers whose applications were rejected will be returned to their countries of origin. As voluntary returns of people in question is the preferred modality for return, the Federal Office for Immigration and Asylum will pilot a financial support project regarding return and reintegration for Afghan, Moroccan, and Nigerian nationals.

The EU-Turkey agreement was a priority debate in of the European Parliament plenary meeting with participation from European Council President, Donald Tusk, and Commission President, Jean-Claude Juncker on Wednesday, 13 April.

A broad majority of Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) voiced concern over the agreement and called on the Commission and Council to closely monitor the situation of human rights and freedom of speech in Turkey, as well as allegations that Syrian refugees are being pushed back to Syria by the Turkish authorities. They also questioned whether Turkey can be considered a “safe country” of return for refugees. Many questioned whether the deal would work, arguing that smugglers would find new paths. Some expressed concern over the lack of staff to deal with the situation in Greece. Others stressed that although the agreement may not be perfect, it is the most realistic tool available to tackle the current situation.

In addition, priorities were outlined for the upcoming reform of the Dublin regulation, with emphasis on the fact that EU Member States must take responsibility for implementing the relocation and resettlement programmes and reiterating the need to ensure safe and legal ways to Europe.

Earlier this week on 12 April, in a non-binding resolution, MEPs acknowledged the failure of the EU asylum system to cope with ever-rising numbers of refugee/migrant arrivals and called for a radical overhaul of the so-called Dublin rules. They propose establishing a central system for collecting and allocating asylum applications. The scheme, which could include a quota for each EU member state, would work on the basis of “hotspots” from which refugees would be distributed.

In view of the current influx of refugees and migrants into the Union, MEPs also approved €100 million for humanitarian aid, the first tranche from the new €700m Emergency Assistance instrument proposed by the European Commission on 2 March. The funds could be used, inter alia, for food assistance, emergency healthcare, shelter, water, sanitation and hygiene, protection, and education.
