This app uses crowd-sourcing to rate perceptions about safety (based on criteria such as availability of lighting and public transport, the quality of paths and security, and the presence of women and children) in any area that they choose. The ultimate intention is to make cities safer by presenting crowd-sourced data to decision makers and city planners so that a response can be justified to improve the safety of an area. While it has not been specifically adapted to the humanitarian context, there is an opportunity to adapt it to the humanitarian context. The app is already available in Romanian and Polish. The UN colleagues will present it at the next World Urban Forum in Katowice, Poland on the 29th of June.

Action Point: Erica to follow up with Juma to gauge the level of interest in Poland to see if it is something that can be adapted to a humanitarian context.
