Accommodation for Relocation Project Timeline

A total of 9,624 pledges (14 per cent) have been made by the EU Member States so far. ## A beneficiary's story (I): "Please accept us with open arms"

Waad (far left) sits with her new found friends who she was accommodated with in Rovies, Evia island through UNHCR's partner Solidarity Now.

ATHENS, Greece, 2 September (UNHCR) - Waad arrived in Greece with her family in February 2016. When they first arrived, they stayed in one of the sites in Thessaloniki for three months before they could be pre-registered through Skype by the Greek Asylum Service. They were accommodated in a hotel in Rovies, Evia island, managed by partner Solidarity Now (Fact sheet August 2016 issue, A beneficiary's story- "This desire for a home has never been stronger") where they lived for another two months. In August, after six whole months from arriving in Greece, the interviews with the German Embassy began. It was decided that it would be better that they stay in Athens whilst the process is being completed rather than at Rovies, hours away from the capital. Again, Waad's family moved to a hotel in central Athens, managed by the same partner of UNHCR, Solidarity Now. Once the process started, the notification from the German embassy- basically an authorization to travel, was given in two weeks. When Waad knew where her new home is likely to be in Germany, she set to action.

It has been years since she has not been in school. Eager to learn and make most of the resources available, having no books nor a teacher to teach her German did not faze her. She searched through the web and downloaded programmes – five altogether, to help her with the language and for her family to integrate in the new country as quickly as possible. It is also useful that her dad, a former truck driver, is aware of the German traffic rules, so he can continue his job in their new home. "She is already watching TV series in German", her mother proudly adds. Waad says that Germans greeting each other even if they don't know each other was a reassurance "Just like they do in Syria". She hopes that her new home will offer the same safety and comfort.

Many of her friends she made in Rovies had already left on relocation. She had to say good bye to them when they embarked for Spain and Netherlands amongst others. "It was bitter sweet. They were moving on to the future, back to normalcy. But it was also sad because it would be difficult for me to see them again. It was so fun to be together. When I heard that Germany is where we are going, we were so happy, we cried. The country is full of opportunities and we waited this for so long".

Waad is full of curiosity towards her new home and neighbors, and she is also willing to tell about her home-country. "I want them to know that Syrians are peaceful people. I know that our ways are different, but that should not be the basis of how to treat one another". Waad's mother adds "Syria was a beautiful country, but it has been through war. The country will reinvent itself through the people who have left, like us. We carry Syria in our hearts. The adjustment to another country will not be easy at first, the difference in language, the culture, the people... But eventually we will overcome". Waad shares her relatively flexible perspective. "I want to be one with the community, but also break stereotypes – to show them that we are not terrorists".

Waad wanted to share her final words to her new neighbors. "We are coming soon- please accept us with open arms... Just like the Greeks did".

A beneficiary's story (II): The boys of Lesvos, their hopes and fears

LESVOS, Greece, 17 July (UNHCR) - Iliaktida runs several centres for unaccompanied children in Lesvos. This one houses nine Syrian boys. As minors, they are provided with legal support, in accordance with the Greek legislation which puts the authority of the child to the Prosecutor. Food is cooked by staff who carry out other household duties, and the boys also actively help out to take care of the common spaces. UNHCR asked four boys of their stories on what caused them to separate from their families, and what is on their minds these days.

Mohammed

“ISIS invaded our town. There was violence everywhere and there were people coming to each households and asking for men to join the army. I was about to reach 18, which meant that I would have to be drafted too. Before the war, this would not have been a problem. However I knew very well what this meant now. I would soon kill my own people, or be killed. I didn’t want to do that. I am the oldest of seven siblings and my father is old. He supported my plan to leave Syria and survive this war. I talk to him once in a while. He told me that he is happy that I left, that he is glad that I did not see what happened to our village and country”.

Mustafa

“Our city was totally destroyed. My family left for Germany, but I said I didn’t want to go. Despite all the challenges, I wanted to make my dreams as a chef come true, in the place where I was born. So I chose to stay with my uncle instead. However, after a few months it became clear that there was nothing more to hold on to and the city was not livable. Uncle, aunt and I journeyed through Turkey and to the border between Greece and FYROM. However, when we reached there, the authorities ordered that we separate, as we are not a direct family. I went on a hunger strike for three days so they would reverse their decision. In the end, I was separated from my uncle and aunt and was sent here to stay with my new-found friends.”

Delieel

“There have been constant bombings and shootings for months. The fragments hit my eye one day and I cannot see through my right eye since. I wanted to cure it as soon as possible but there were no doctors to treat this. I used to love studying and had a very clear dream to be a physiotherapist, like my dad. However, the schools shut and I was really frustrated with the situation. I want to have a surgery on my eye as soon as possible so I can return to be a student again.”

Karam

“One day I received a call to join the forces, but I didn’t want to partake in continuing the war. I knew there will be alternatives elsewhere. This was my first time travelling outside Syria. I never knew that I would be in Greece, and it’s amazing to know that such a beautiful place exists. The technology, the people, the nature, everything awes me. The more I see, the more I learn. During my travels, there were some bad people who wanted to take advantage of my situation and some treated me rudely. However, I try not to dwell upon this. Another important thing I learnt here was not to show everyone how good you are, but something more genuine, directly from the heart. I am eager to know more about the different ways of people and I am not afraid for the future. My only fear is that it may take long to see my family again.”

Since the interview, the boys are still waiting for their application to be processed. From October, they will start going to school, attending a class specially designated for asylum-seekers.
